France To Build RN Carriers

Lord Drayson, Labour's defence procurement minister, wants Britain and France to share construction of the two super carriers promised for the Royal Navy. The French, who have already bought the design for the carriers for £100m, are proposing that they should build one. This is currently opposed by the UK's biggest shipbuilder, BAE Systems, who believe the French shipyards lack capacity and that British companies would not want to see their influence over the project diluted.

Globalisation Hits Workers' Income

Globalisation has driven down the share of national income going to workers in advanced communities, the International Monetary Fund admits in a new study, The World Economic Outlook. For the first time in a significant policy document, the IMF says "labour globalisation has negatively affected the share of income going to labour in the advanced economies."

However, the IMF argues that workers in the industrialised world have still benefited overall from globalisation because it has boosted productivity, driven down the price of traded goods and increased the price of rich world exports relative to rich world imports.

Contrary to popular belief, the IMF finds the negative impact of globalisation on the labour share of income was bigger in sectors employing mostly skilled employees than it was in unskilled sectors.

Racist Gang Walk Free After Rampage

People in Hampshire were astounded last month when a mainly Afghan gang who screamed racist abuse as they went on a violent rampage through Southampton city centre escaped jail terms. The seven-man gang left bystanders unconscious and bleeding. Yet only one was sent to prison, and that was for drug offences. One waved a knife in the face of two terrified women shouting: "I'm from Afghanistan. I'm a Muslim. I'm going to stab every white person."

After leaving a bar, the group began hurling abuse at white people waiting for taxis and one, Suraj Bhakar, kicked a cab. Bhakar then hurled racist remarks at two women, before producing a flick knife. The gang then approached another group, where Bhakar, Harvinder Khurda and Dalvinder Gujra, kicked and punched one of the group, Glyn Richards, to the floor. Tripinder Pattar kicked him unconscious and Mandeep Dalviar stamped on his head. Two passers-by were also kicked and punched. They then found another victim at a bus stop, who they claimed called them "a Paki". He too was left bleeding and bruised after repeated punches and kicks from all but one of the gang.

Despite most of the gang being found guilty of racially aggravated assault and affray, they merely received 12-month suspended sentences and community punishment orders from the judge, Recorder Richard Onslow. Local BNP members ask if such lenient sentences would have been given if the racial origins of the attackers and the victims had been reversed?

Dave And His Guardian Pals

Ephraim Hardcastle in his column in the Daily Mail, 28.04.07 revealed that, except for faithful Guardianista Polly Toynbee, the top brass of the liberal-left Guardian newspaper "canoodles with the Conservatives."

Hardcastle wrote: "Executive editor Ian Katz skis with Cameron's guru, Steve Hilton, and chief leader writer Julian Glover, civil partner of former Tory MP Matthew Parris is a Cameroonian."

Muslim Extremists Encourage Race War

According to the American Conservative Times, Al-Zawahri, Osama bin Laden's No.2 who was killed last June in Iraq, had encouraged minorities around the world to join the jihad against the West. "Al-Qaida is not merely for the benefit of Muslims," he said. "That's why I want blacks in America, people of colour, American Indians, Hispanics, and all the weak and oppressed in North and South America, in Africa and Asia, and all over the world to support us."

The article, of May 12th, pointed out that other than a few token whites in entertainment or academia, hardly any white have converted to Islam. In the United States, as in Britain, the primary converts have been black, and recently 200,000 Mestizos (Hispanics) have converted to Islam.

The Conservative Times advocates complete US withdrawal from the Middle East.

Foreign Prisoners Clog Up Our Jails

New figures show that if there were not so many foreign inmates there would not be an overcrowding crisis in Britain's jails. They now make up almost one in six, 12,122, of our jail population and are costing the taxpayer almost £400 million a year to keep. In 1996 there were fewer than 5,000 overseas prisoners.

Over the past five years, while the number of British prisoners has gone up by about 10%, there has been an 80% increase in foreigners. The largest number are from Jamaica (1,490), followed by Nigeria (1,070).

Malaysia Puts the Block on Religious Harmony

The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Rowan Williams, suffered an embarrassing serious setback last month in his attempts to foster Muslim-Christian dialogue after the Malaysian Government banned an interfaith conference he was due to be chairing. Christian and Muslim scholars from around the world had bought air tickets, written papers and began to pack to their bags "Building Bridges" conference when it was cancelled with just two weeks notice. Islam is the official state religion in Malaysia and Muslims are subject to sharia law.

Blair's Last Broken Promise

As we write it seems a fair bet that Blair's long goodbye will culminate in his signing Britain's commitment to the revised EU Constitutional Treaty. It will, of course, be another broken promise to the British electorate that he would not surrender our independence without first allowing us a referendum. But if he is to enjoy the riches that will come with his new career of performing upon the global capitalists' stage, then he must first deliver us politically to the EU and its ever increasing bureaucratic regulations. Should by chance Blair not have the time to sign the new EU Treaty, then Gordon Brown will certainly be willing to do so.

It is now over two years since the Dutch and the French electorate turned down the original 2004 EU Constitution which would have made it a virtual European state in its own right. Under the German presidency of the EU, a few minimal changes have been made to pacify French, Dutch and, no doubt, British voters. One of the changes is the symbolic dropping of the title "Constitution". This has given the ever disingenuous Tony Blair the opportunity to kid us that the new version is really only a mini treaty. "Honestly", says Tony, with slight choke in voice and in best actor mode, "it is intended to make the EU work better."

The new Cameron Conservative party, aware that concern over the EU's growing control over our national sovereignty is still not the major issue with the British electorate that it should be, shows every sign of supporting the new Treaty. As for the Lib-Dems, support for the EU is a paramount article of faith. This is epitomised by the statement made last month by Lib-Dem MEP Andrew Duff. Talking about the new version of the EU Constitution, he expressed his disappointment that the pro-European countries have "failed" to have more of the first Constitution included in the new draft, in the face of serious opposition from several EU member states led by Britain. He went on to say: "They are following in the slip stream of the English which is the prominent euro-sceptical country. If the English can be defeated then the opposition in Prague will disappear."

It is on the opposition to surrendering our sovereignty to the EU that the BNP finds common cause with UKIP (although we differ on other issues). We therefore applaud the response of UKIP MEP Jeffrey Titford to Andrew Duff's comments. "He is English himself and is calling for the defeat of his own country. He is also thumbing his nose at the voters in France and the Netherlands who solidly rejected the Constitution in separate referenda."

At the end of April ICM Research carried out a poll which found that 69% of Britons would like to vote on the proposal that the UK should have a looser relationship with Europe, maintaining free trade and co-operation on common policies, but opting out of political and economic integration. Only 27% said they wanted the UK to stay a full EU member on current terms.

We Are Not Anti-European

The blatant internationalists among the media scribes (who are happy to continue attacking Germans as "Nazis") will accuse those calling for a looser relationship with Europe as being xenophobic. This of course is not true, and like the BNP most people who are wary of the Marxist-inspired autocracy of the European Union seek co-operation with our fellow Europeans. As I wrote in this column exactly one year ago: "As Europeans we must destroy the EU and start again with pacts, alliances, favoured nations treaties, that recognise that what has made Europe great is the individuality of its nations, even though we stand on the shoulders of individual giants; such geniuses as Leonardo da Vinci, Shakespeare, Goethe, Beethoven, Voltaire and Frederick the Great, to name but a few. They came from the gene pool of the European people and no matter how intelligent the sons and daughters of new Asian or Arab migrants to Europe may be they will never be able to replicate our great European forbears."

Finally, we would again remind readers that one of the greatest threats from the EU 'commissars' is the plan for a Europe-wide justice system and police force. The objective would, for example, give it the power to arrest someone in Britain over an alleged infringement of a European law elsewhere. Habeas Corpus and Trial by Jury, unknown on the continent, will be ditched. It could also make the BNP illegal. A little known legislation entitled 'Framework decisions on combating racism and xenophobia' would make the following punishable by two years imprisonment: Public dissemination or distribution of tracts, pictures or other material containing expressions of racism and xenophobia; directing of a racist or xenophobic group (by "group" is meant a structural organisation consisting of at least two persons established for a specific period).

We have been warned.

John Bean

Superficially the proposal in the introduction below is both logical and reasonable. To individuals who think that we and UKIP are natural partners who have only failed to hit it off because no thoughtful matchmaker has come along to introduce us, what follows may at first sight therefore appear deeply illogical and unreasonable. By the end of this article, however, I hope that such readers will see a clearer picture, and that those who already think otherwise will be better equipped to understand - and to explain to others - the uniqueness of the BNP. So this is why there neither can nor should be an alliance between the British National Party and UKIP:

The BNP is an innately Politically Incorrect organisation which, while it has a full range of policies on all issues, is primarily known for our principled and forthright opposition not just to mass immigration and the wilder excesses of multiculturalism, but also to the very concept of a multi-racial society, and the superstition of innate human equality and nurture over nature. This places us in diametrical opposition to everything believed, imposed and planned by the 1968 generation post-Marxists who dominate the institutions of the Western world.

This is why the left-liberal elite, which has captured all the main political parties, the broadcast media and all the other commanding positions within the British Establishment, hates us to the point of hysteria. We are not an alternative, we are their nemesis. Which means that it isn't always comfortable to be a mover and shaker in the BNP.

INTIMIDATION

There are two key ways in which the Powers That Be try to make it uncomfortable for us. The first is intimidation - physical, financial and moral. The second uses the great vice of the English - snobbery. This is why so much media effort goes into portraying the BNP as a party of knuckle dragging boneheads from collapsing sink estates; even though our appeal these days is understandable, to respond to it is something a nice middle class person just cannot do without the fear of losing social status.

Needless to say, that social fear is largely groundless, and the hard work of recent years has greatly diminished it. Likewise we have succeeded in reducing the fear that the actual and implied intimidation will actually come to anything, but the trouble with many UKIP types is that they are simultaneously snobs and cowards, and even the reduced negatives are more than enough for them. As a result it doesn't matter how electorally advantageous it would be to the Euro-realist cause for them to do a deal with us, they would far rather remain 'respectable' failures than

The BNP & UKIP Be Getting Mar

» "If only we could stop splitting the nationalist vote. The BNP and UKIP have got to do a deal and get together." This is the cry that can be heard after every election, particularly from newcomers and sympathisers among the general public. Nick Griffin explains why it will not happen.

Won't ried

be successful in partnership with us.

This is not theory; we have seen it over and over again in practice, and many of us have had it confirmed through direct contact from time to time with some of these people and their ilk over several decades. The only thing that might change them is the total and repeated failure of their party to make a sustained breakthrough or to make a difference in the struggle against the federal EU hydra. At present some of them still actually believe that they might get somewhere, and those who will become susceptible to appeals to switch to us when they realise that their truly dreadful leadership is doing a Grand Old Duke of York act with their time, money and energy.

UKIP'S LACK OF LEADERSHIP

Their senior leadership is, of course, a particular stumbling block to co-operation of some kind. Since getting elected to the European Parliament (overwhelmingly thanks to the Establishment's use of their party as a safety valve to keep us out) they have emerged as one of the greediest, self-serving, hypocritical gang of low-lives in recent British political history - which is saying something!

Their pre-election promise to hand over to their party chunks of their obscene expenses claims has gone unfulfilled, and lurid media exposés of UKIP Euro-booze and Euro-sex adventures hint at where the money has gone. Party leaders use Polish scab labour imported by their family businesses to do up their country mansions. Huge accountancy black holes dominate their finances. Over in Brussels they are photographed in states of alcoholic collapse in sleazy bars and nightclubs.

Add to this their record of appalling political and organisational incompetence. While their unfortunate untrained and unsupported volunteers are thrown like lambs to the slaughter into endless humiliation in local council elections, the leadership clique blows vast amounts of money on ridiculously unrealistic high profile electoral efforts for themselves or their cronies. Last year the Bromley parliamentary by-election, this year the Welsh Assembly Elections, next year no doubt somewhere else. And each time their truly pathetic votes cost them £20 - £30 each. That's no way to run a political party.

UKIP only managed to become a national organisation of sorts on the back of the late Sir James Goldsmith's enormous investment in building the short-lived Referendum Party in the run up to the 1997 General Election. £19 million spent on this project, with a considerable amount going on recruitment advertising and salaries for full-time regional organisers, created a genuine grass-roots presence that swapped en masse to UKIP when Goldsmith died.

UKIP's only other notable achievement

- victory in the last European Elections - was handed to them on a plate by New Labour scheming involving Robert Kilroy-Silk, Max Clifford and Dick Morris, who was 'lent' by Bill Clinton to Tony Blair and thence to UKIP. The accomplished aim was a double whammy, using that party as a safety valve to keep out the BNP and to take votes off the Tories.

So the plain truth is that UKIP's key successes have had nothing to do with their own leadership. Indeed, many of their rank-and-file members will admit quite frankly that what advances they have made have often been in spite of, not thanks to, the gaggle of perpetually feuding, banana-skin prone and short-sighted Hooray Henries and politically ignorant estate agents who run their show.

As leader of the BNP, I have worked hard to bring into our own party hierarchy talented individuals from the leadership cadres of previous nationalist organisations - Martin Wingfield and John Bean are two prominent examples - and to establish good working relationships on non-party political projects, such as Solidarity, with others, for example Third Way's Patrick Harrington. Likewise, we have in recent years welcomed significant numbers of former UKIP organisers, candidates and activists into the BNP, and their growing presence is one of the factors behind our steady advance in recent years. This trend will no doubt continue.

We are also working on joint projects with several genuinely competent individuals who have left UKIP and who, while not intending to join us, are at least doing useful work opposing the EU and all its works and who therefore deserve our respect and co-operation.

There is, however, a huge difference between teaming up in some way with individuals or organisations with a track record of competence and success in their own fields, and trying to get together with the leaders of another party who have displayed a total inability to organise a piss-up in a brewery. There is also the big fish in small ponds factor. Their level of organisation is so woefully inferior to ours that some of UKIP's senior hierarchy just wouldn't be any use to us at the kind of level at which they would insist on being involved.

LABOUR PARTY BACKING

A further problem with the naïve wish for an alliance with UKIP to avoid splitting the 'nationalist' vote is that, in certain places, the UKIP vote-splitters have been actively backed by the Labour Party. The damage here is not the accidental by-product of rivalry between two similar parties, it is the intended consequence of a cynical ploy by our Europhile opponents. So there is no point appealing to these people not to split the vote, because that's precisely what they've intended to do all along.

The only way to deal with this is our beating them over and over again until either their well-meaning dupes give up and join us or go away, or we make them so irrelevant that we win despite their vote-splitting efforts, as happened in Barking and Dagenham.

In addition to all these practical bars to 'nationalist unity' there is an ideological barrier too: While UKIP contains many nationalists, it is not a nationalist party. For mere opposition to membership of the European Union is not nationalism.

Genuine nationalism is based on a view of the nation as an extended family, linked by overwhelming ties of common ancestry and shared history, and the corresponding belief that the members of that family not only have the right to chose their own government, but that that government has a fundamental duty to so order the affairs and economy of the country so as to protect and advance the interests of the people of that country.

In opposing our enforced membership of the fundamentally undemocratic, unaccountable and supra-national European Union, UKIP clears one hurdle, but then falls at the next by proposing as its favoured alternative a Britain committed to free trade globalism, a system in which the economy is automatically and unavoidably run for the short-term interests of multinational big business. In terms of international politics too, UKIP's cunning plan is to replace British subservience to Brussels with renewed surrender to Washington, New York and Beijing. They are anti-EU, but they are nevertheless internationalists. Different brand, but the same type of poison.

Following on from this there is no sign in UKIP whatsoever of the understanding that the head of an extended family cannot stand back and worship 'market forces' as outsiders and greedy renegades run smash-and-grab raids on the family assets and while grotesque social injustices tear the family into warring factions.

A POLICY OF NATIONAL SUICIDE

Even worse, UKIP's leadership openly preach the PC fiction that being British/English/Scottish/etc is merely a matter of geography. Their immigration policy is based purely on the concept of space, with no thought to ethnicity and precious little for the culture that springs from it. Hence their idea of being 'tough' in this field is to propose limiting the number of new immigrants allowed into the UK each year to balance the number of people leaving the country.

A moment's thought tells us that this is not an immigration policy so much as a recipe for national suicide; a sort of controlled ethnic cleansing operation. The prospects for native 'Brits' - especially those with young families - in many parts of over-taxed, multicultural Britain are so grim that at least 300,000 of our brightest and best flee the country each year. UKIP is happy with this, for it makes space in their book for a further 300,000 Somalis, Nigerians, Afghans, Pakistanis or whatever every year. And all of them, according to UKIP, become instant Britons the moment they breathe the air of our Blessed, though increasingly diverse and unstable, Plot. Provided they learn to ask for their handouts in English, of course.

Although even the suggestion of limiting immigration is regarded by the BBC as 'right-wing', the truth is that UKIP's position on this crucial issue, far from being 'nationalist', is in fact well to the left of the Tory government from 1970-74.

Even Ted Heath promised that there would be no more large-scale primary immigration, and his Home Office instituted a system (still technically in place today) under which members of ethnic minorities could apply for grants to help them to return to their lands of ethnic origin.

UKIP's native population replacement policy involves an annual shift towards an alien majority of two thirds of a million every year. That's without considering the enormous birth-rate of many of the immigrant communities already here. The fact that Farage and his puppet-masters at the BBC try to 'sell' this support for colonisation to the public as a tough

UKIP - where the head-bangers will hit the wall next

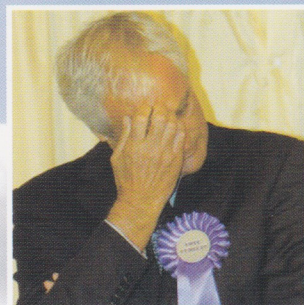

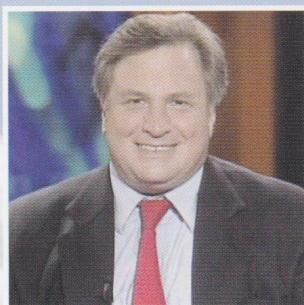

Among the reduced number of councils with elections next May, the following saw unusually high concentrations of UKIP candidates (nine or more) this year, and need an extra special effort from us to win over their best people and grind them into the dust electorally:

immigration policy should certainly not fool members of the BNP; UKIP may well split the nationalist vote but, lacking as they do any understanding of what makes a real nation, they are not nationalists.

Of course, we do share quite a few policy points with UKIP, but the same can in fact be said of virtually any party. UKIP

In a concerted effort to keep genuine nationalists out of Brussels Labour borrowed Bill Morris (above left) from Bill Clinton, and with the help of Kilroy they presented an effective establishment safety valve. Kilroy then went on to destroy what he created by splitting UKIP and setting up his own party - Veritas - which soon imploded.

Even Bill Clinton was roped in to make UKIP a British political safety valve want tougher sentences for criminals, just as we do. The Greens favour a big shift towards sustainable organic farming, and we do too. Respect oppose the privatisation of the Post Office, and we do too. But even a number of points of agreement do not make realistic potential allies out of two parties with very different ideological foundations.

As a matter of fact, UKIP doesn't really have a coherent ideology, not least because its leaders' attempts to bring under one single issue anti-EU roof everyone from old Labour anti-Common Market types through to Colonel Flogginham-Whippem (Rtd) have forced them to avoid articulating positions on other potentially contentious topics.

At best, there is in UKIP a vague consensus around a dimly understood civic nationalism, and the populism of the saloon bar of the middle class local. This, and the fact that they have already nearly all crossed a personal Rubicon in terms of ditching their earlier loyalty to an Establishment party, makes its members relatively easy targets for BNP recruiters.

But it also makes it essential that, once recruited, they are rapidly inculcated with an understanding of genuine nationalism. Such people are very welcome, and can easily be integrated when they come in by dribs and drabs. But it would be a recipe for disaster if they all came in at once, as would logically happen if it was possible for UKIP and the BNP to join forces.

This is a danger that will shrink the more our still very embryonic Voting Membership system gets deeply entrenched. But until it is then the sad fact is that - even if it was possible - the short-term vote-maximising benefits of a merger with UKIP would rapidly be outweighed by the impact of a wave of 'soft' upper class civic nationalists who would inevitably push for a 'one man, one vote' system and then destroy the party by trying to impose a liberalisation programme on us.

Hence, on balance, we are forced to the conclusion that an alliance with UKIP would not in fact be desirable even if it were possible. And since, in any case, the practical reasons outlined above make it wholly impossible, that's an end of the matter.

OCCASIONAL DEALS

There may very occasionally be local reasons or even national propaganda considerations within the Eurosceptic movement as a whole why we offer to do one-off electoral deals with UKIP. But that is only where a carefully considered calculation indicates that it is in our organisational interest to do so.

So never be fooled by such gestures, however good some of UKIP's activists - and even second level leaders - are, the party itself is a dead-end safety valve ideological mishmash. Despite our common determination to withdraw from the EU (though their MEPs sometimes have a strange way of showing it, when they vote for things such as Europe-wide school indoctrination lessons) organisationally and politically, UKIP is as much our enemy as the Lib-Lab-Con gang.

So there is no point wasting time wishing on a star for electoral pacts with them. We just have to get on with the job of applying our far superior party machine and our ever-increasing experience in community politics, so as to beat them even more convincingly in even more places.

We should always be friendly with their rank-and-file at events such as election counts and public meetings, for most of them belong with us, but there can be no local 'deals' and no leaving them wards to try to win, for every time they get a half-decent vote because we stand aside it only gives them a bit more heart to keep banging their heads against a brick wall. We have to be cruel to be kind to these people, for the only kind of unity which will be sustainable and truly useful will be when they join the British National Party - on our terms.

» The last weekend of May saw an in-depth election analysis meeting of key national and regional BNP officials held in Northamptonshire. Run jointly by National Elections Officer Eddy Butler and BNP Chairman Nick Griffin, the meeting considered experiences and opinions passed to key officials by a wide variety of local candidates and activists. The resulting analysis, and some of the key core conclusions as to the next steps we must take, are outlined below:

"In key target wards we were out-organised. In many areas we have a very good base vote, but to win we need a spike of support on top. As a direct result of our repeated electoral success, in particular our pioneering use of postal votes in our crushing by-election victory in Barking three years ago, the Labour Party has undergone a paradigm shift in the effectiveness of its election machine. They and their union allies are now capable of out-organising us in a limited number of places, thereby cutting off the top of our support spike.

"It was this ability, carefully targeted, that held us back from winning in several dozen wards in May. To overcome their newly developed techniques, we must:

a) Outrun their ability to stop us by increasing our number of properly worked target wards and,

b) Develop new deep community politics techniques which make us relevant to the majority non-voters who Labour's new techniques totally ignore.

"In simple terms, we have got to continue to do what we already do, but do it more consistently and in more places, and at the same time up our game by rolling out new and successful experiments in a growing number of key target wards."

These three paragraphs sum up the overall conclusions of the conference, which considered in-depth reports from Eddy Butler and Nick Griffin, and then debated a wide range of possible BNP responses before settling on a concrete set of proposals for further future advances.

The starting point is to recognise that even 'perfect' BNP operations which would have won a couple of years ago are no longer capable of beating the opposition's transformed approach. Hence our efforts this year were largely blocked, despite our contesting more seats with better leaflets, a slicker central machine, and with many local units fighting better campaigns than ever before.

Since Labour - and the other Establishment parties as well - will now use these new techniques as widely as possible, our present 'best practice' operations will from now on invariably produce good seconds rather than close firsts. A serious economic downturn or some other change in external circumstances would of course change things, but under present conditions the truth is that our opponents have now worked out how to keep us out in most cases.

This is no surprise. The Joseph Rowntree Trust and the Home Office have both spent tens of thousands of pounds (probably more) finding out why some people vote for us, what might stop them, what stops others, and how to concentrate the minds of those who oppose us.

BNP elections expert Eddy Butler

Lessons From The May Elections

In ward after key ward in this election, we heard during the campaign that "the Labour party have given up. The only person doing anything is the candidate, who is delivering leaflets on his own." The latter was true, but the activists hadn't given up on anything - except the 65% of the electorate who didn't vote last year.

So what were they doing?

1) The non-voters were ignored. Almost all of the work in their new style campaign goes into the people who are shown by the marked ward register to have voted last time. This enables a small number of activists to have a disproportionate impact on the electors most likely to decide the result.

2) Telephone canvassers - from Labour and the LibDems, the unions, Searchlight and probably others we don't even know about spent many months calling people on the marked register and finding out their voting intentions.

3) Anti-BNP voters were then targeted to encourage tactical voting, generally in favour of Labour, but not always.

4) BNP voters were hit with smears. This accounts for the apparently weaker and sporadic efforts with Hope Not Hate - hitting only identified BNP voters will have allowed far greater electoral impact than the old-fashioned blanket approach in which 6 out of 10 reached people who were not going to vote anyway.

5) This was done in two waves - first working the postal voters and then switching to people who use the polling booths.

6) There is at least circumstantial evidence that the collection of postal votes also provides the opportunity to steal ones in our favour. In Tamworth, where we were not expected, we took 25% of the vote and 20% of the postal vote. In some areas where they were ready for us reports indicate that we got hardly any postal votes. A drop in our postal percentage may indicate merely an increase in the number of opposition voters being encouraged to apply for postal votes, but their virtual absence in some areas where we have a high level of support would suggest that a concerted effort is being made to identify and destroy them.

7) They target ethnic voters.

These changes add up to a qualitative rather than a quantitative difference in the campaign against us in key areas. This explains perfectly - without the slightly paranoid claim of widespread fraud - the great question of the campaign: Why when a record number of the public seemed to be on our side did we not win more seats? Because many of those on our side don't vote, while the opposition maximised their vote and minimised ours among the people who do vote.

Further crucial evidence that our problem is Labour's re-organisation is the fact that, out of the nine seats we took this time, four were Conservative. To take nearly half of our seats off the Tories is a huge turn-around from last year, when almost all the seats we took were from Labour. Particularly given the fact that the Conservatives were on a bit of a roll with a new leader, this is a remarkable shift that can only be explained by the impact of Labour's paradigm shift in organisation.

So what do we do about it?

The knee-jerk reaction to seeing the value to the opposition of the marked register is to copy them.

There are, however, three key problems with this approach:

i) We know that large numbers of our supporters don't bother to vote. To ignore them in order to concentrate on the marked register would be to write them off;

ii) In most areas the hardcore voters who turn out even in local elections, people who are by definition either more political or more habitual than everyone else, are likely to be roughly divided in two - nearly a third who are willing to vote for us, and two-thirds who are against us. To an extent, any in-depth work we did just on the entire marked register would toughen up our third of the voters in our favour, but confirm to the other two-thirds that we are a serious threat and therefore make them even more likely to heed the call to vote tactically for the party most likely to keep us out;

iii) In making extensive use of the marked register the basis of their tactical doctrine, the opposition are in danger of cutting themselves off even more effectively than ever from the majority of the population who have given up voting in local elections at a time of general disillusionment with politics in an era of (outside sink estates) extreme consumerist well-being.

To do this in order to concentrate on an increasingly elderly party loyalist base will help them win elections in the short to medium term, but it opens up a gap that a party which finds ways to engage with the currently depoliticised majority could fill very effectively in the future.

There are already clear signs that the LibDems and Conservatives are also now learning from Labour's radical tactical rethink; in fact they have very little choice but to do so. All three old parties, after all, are in competition for the slowly shrinking and somewhat elderly habitual voters block. Once one of them learns to almost treble the effectiveness of their limited manpower by concentrating almost exclusively on roughly one third of the electorate, the others will have to follow suit or lose election after election.

Most voters have not yet seen Cameron's leftward drift and merely believe it now 'OK' to vote Tory again

The big long term problem for them all, however, is that this will in turn further speed up the process whereby the political elite are withdrawing from contact with the de-politicised and disillusioned majority. As with their squabbling for handfuls of swing voters in a few marginal seats, this unavoidable concentration on a minority is a piece of chronic short-termism that will come back to haunt them at the polls in the future - provided an effective real alternative can be built that has both the grass-roots organisation and the common sense policies needed to reconnect with the otherwise ignored taxpaying majority.

That said, we have to find ways to overcome the short-term advantage that massive use of the marked register and the dodgy postal votes system gives to our opponents. We, or independent 'third party disparager' groups sympathetic to nationalism, can also use the marked register and the list of people who have applied for postal votes:

i) To identify the best recipients of material designed to depress the vote of whichever party is our main rival;

ii) To target people with postal votes with special mail shots timed to coincide with the arrival of their ballot papers; iii) To identify existing supporters who in fact failed to vote, and to encourage them to do better next time;

iv) To identify the majority who didn't vote and visit a cross-section of them with a survey designed to find out why they didn't vote and what a party could do to make them vote in future. This information can then be used in planning activities and community politics initiatives designed to reconnect these people to the democratic process as our supporters.

As for the postal vote scam, it was decided that we should not attempt to fight fire with fire. First, because pressuring people - especially the elderly - into voting for a particular party is wrong; second, because if we did it the media would scream blue murder about it, and, third, because so many postal votes for us get stolen. To encourage our supporters to apply for them would expose them to identification and pressure from the opposition, and to hand their votes to far-left postmen and town hall officials - not so much on a plate as already in the bin.

Instead, we discussed and then approved Eddy Butler's proposals for a major campaign later this year to depress the number of postal votes applied for in general. This will involve leaflets and other publicity material designed to alert people to the possibility of their postal vote being stolen and the certainty of their getting nuisance phone calls from the different parties if they register to vote by post. Some will be for general use, and others will target those who had postal votes this time. There is already widespread public and journalistic disquiet over the creeping corruption of our electoral system that the material should be widely believable, and hence effective to an as yet unknown extent, as well as allowing us to take the moral high ground as defenders of genuine democracy.

Our equivalent of ethnic voters are young white voters who often do not register. A revived Operation White Vote would clearly be useful if pushed properly. We are also working separately on a pilot scheme for a programme to bring us into

Dear Voter

I am a married mother of two, and a business partner. I have lived in Rothley for over 30 years and would love the chance to represent you all as your local councillor. I am standing for the BNP to give the silent majority a voice. A lot of people are unhappy with the way things are going in this country today, from the war in Iraq to the sleaze in parliament. Voting BNP will send a firm message that change is needed. The other parties are so alike, it doesn't matter who you vote for nothing changes.

My interests outside of local politics are reading and the theatre. I am very passionate about education and I believe every child's birthright is to receive quality schooling. If elected I would be a strong voice on the council and make sure that the concerns of local people were addressed.

good-terms contact with young people in selected target wards.

The next thing to do is to consider why canvassing works. It is NOT because our canvassers convince people to change their political views on the doorstep. Genuine political policy discussions with potential voters are in practice almost unheard of in canvassing campaigns. The Joseph Rowntree Trust research that identified canvassing (and door-to-door paper sales) as our big gun also said clearly that the voters convinced by our canvassers were won over by the contrast between the reality of a BNP activist and what they had been told to expect by the media and smear leaflets. Canvassing works not by political reasoning but by creating cognitive dissonance.

It follows therefore that other tactics that create similar cognitive dissonance would be as effective as canvassing. This is good because - provided we can find and encourage the use of such tactics, we should be able to draw on a larger number of individuals who can thereby take part in our cognitive dissonance push for greater support and higher votes. After all, there are plenty of people who are absolutely dedicated BNP activists but who for some reason are unwilling or unable to canvass effectively. Some of these may well be ideally suited to help out in one or other of our new ancillary operations.

Anything which conveys to some or all of the voters in a ward the idea that BNP members are not racist monsters, one-track-minded fanatics or troublemaking skinhead thugs will help to create the fertile gap between opposition smears and BNP reality in which support for us takes root and grows.

Such community work can come in many forms. It might be as low-level assistance to needy individuals, occasional more labour intensive one-offs such as clean-ups, or longer term projects involving securing grant money, establishing a St. George's Day celebration committee or running a Community Observation Patrol to reduce anti-social behaviour.

SPREAD THE WORD

Whatever approach or combination of techniques is used, it is vitally important not just that it is done, but that the whole of the ward is told that it has been done - and asked what they want done next. To make this easier the Publicity Department will be producing each month a local leaflet template, complete with space for such material and help and advice on filling it effectively. The aim should be to use one of these in a section of each target ward every other month, or in the whole ward at least once a quarter. This includes wards we need to hold as well as those where we want to win.

It is important to note that all the proposals outlined above are regarded as being additional to our existing way of working. Our current 'best practice' - door-to-door paper selling/canvassing; high profile local clean-ups and less visible work to help sort the problems of individual electors; attendance at local community meetings and events, and the regular distribution of localised newsletters telling residents about our work on their behalf - provides the ideal soil in which to work to put down even deeper community roots using the cutting edge techniques outlined above and being rolled out in detail at the Summer School, RWB and other training events.

There is, after all, nothing wrong with what we've been doing - except that it has driven our opponents to up their game! If we merely duplicated our existing best practice in more wards we would without doubt from time to time strike lucky by overwhelming their capacity to run their own ideal operations to stop us. But we don't want to leave it to luck, we need to move up a further gear and produce additional winning techniques that give us the edge again in the political arms race.

The aim of the new techniques we are now working on is to build our support from passive sympathy to actual voting levels, particularly among the 30% of the population who vote in general elections but don't bother in local ones, and among the people who have given up voting because they believe that "all politicians are the same."

All the signs are that these people are immune to political argument in local elections because they don't think they make a difference, because all candidates are the same and are in it for themselves. Thus improving our political operations - vital though this is - will not touch them. Hence the urgent need for us to build on our existing political work by applying the new deep community politics initiatives being developed by our people in places like Wiltshire, Leicestershire and Greater Manchester.

No doubt other activists and organisers will emerge whose local experiments can be incorporated into our support building and power winning techniques. The irony is that, by going to such extraordinary lengths to stop us winning twenty or thirty more seats this time, our opponents have forced us to undertake a really fundamental assessment of how we work, and to come up with new ideas which have the potential to put our operations in a totally new league above their own.

It's what Cromwell did for the armies of parliament after their early setbacks in the English Civil War. It's like the way bacteria become resistant to antibiotics; the ones that adapt don't just survive, they turn out stronger than ever. Coming to target wards near you - with your help - the New Model British National Party, more virulent than ever!

Album Review:

West Wind

» Peter Ashford reviews the latest release from Great White Records.

This is Great White Records' first ever in-house produced album. West Wind is recorded completely at GWR's recording studio and is a huge direction change for the label, both in quality of sound, and quality in the genre of music.

This album was first conceived as merely an idea some 12 months ago, and as it took shape, GWR knew they were onto a winner. But guided and produced by Studio Producer Alan Smith, the album exceeded all of GWR's expectations.

It is easy to underplay this as just another album. West Wind illustrates a GWR quality product that a while back would not have been possible, but now, due to rapid studio expansion, GWR has produced an album that achieves quality that has not been heard in the nationalist music scene for some time.

West Wind, which includes tracks that are rock, brit-pop, folk, heavy-rock, etc, is on sale through GWR's newly designed website www.greatwhiterecords.com which features interviews with West Wind artists, including Nick Griffin, the writer of the West Wind album and Alan Smith the producer, and many more GWR artists.

The first song Hundred Years Hence immediately told me this album was going to be different from the rest. It is rocky with a tinge of Brit-Pop, and combined with superbly dark vocal by Alan Smith, presents a fantastic album opener, marking GWR's quite sudden change of direction in musical terms. This song is about the traitors and social false-idols of modern Britain, (soap stars, politicians) and their inevitable demise and fall. A truly great start to the album.

Next is Colour sung by David Hannam. This is clearly written by Nick Griffin with Jackie very much fixed in his mind. A beautiful love song with a very catchy Brit-Pop feel to it which

Presentation is Everything

West Wind marks a new high in terms of quality for nationalist music. Not only are the lyrics much more mature than most offerings, but the music is presented in a number of styles, most of which are very modern and progressive and could easily be found in HMV.

The great increase in quality can also be seen in the packaging and presentation. The CD comes in a clear jewel case with a 16 page full colour booklet which includes full lyrics for every song as well as pictures of the artists involved with the different songs. This is an improvement over anything Great White Records has produced before and is something that could easily be sold on the high street.

No expense was spared on the disk itself which is colour printed and sits in a clear tray with a full colour inlay that reveals a beautiful picture as the disk is removed. The whole packaged is finished off with each individual disk factory sealed ensuring that you are the first to open your copy.

seems to suit Dave Hannam well, as he repeats this formula in other songs on the album. If you are looking for the album tearjerker, this is it.

Different Drums is a musical achievement. This is Griffin's favourite song as he recounts on the video interview on the website. Telling the tale of the two fighting sides in the Ireland dispute, this dispute is captured in the imagery of the Bodran of the Gael and the Lambeg of Ulster, two warring instruments, and this song laments the story of the same people fighting each other, An historical track. The best feature of this song is Frank Attack's vocal, very powerful.

I See You is the return of Hannam to one man and a guitar. A very sad, sweet song about the changing face of society about a character who feels lost and unwanted in a society he doesn't recognise anymore.

Nothing Bloody Works is a very comical fast moving song with a humorous view on modern Britain. Sung by Colin Auty. Up-tempo song with a catchy rocky beat makes this a foot tapping track.

Brown Sign Land is a song sung by Frank Attack about the collapse of British Industry and way of life. Frank's vocal delivery is especially poignant on this track. It has feeling, it aches, moans, laughs manically; desperation and absurdity encompasses Frank's vocal. It is a soft on the ears track with an eerie atmosphere.

51st State Lament is about the Amercianisation of British society. Colin has a typically comical vocal on this very compelling song. This is another upbeat song with a very funny middle-eighth section featuring vocals by Nick Cass & family. Great lines from this track includes, "And if you're looking for Stonehenge you'll find the replica's in Kent, the original one's in Disneyland we couldn't pay the rent".

Corporal Fox is a well known track. It first appeared on a BNP party political broadcast and has clearly come a long way. It started a few years back as an acoustic solo folk song, and has now been transformed into a Brit-Pop band song. Has it worked? Yes. This is really Dave Hannam at his best here. Highlighting the injustice of war veterans who return only to be treated like second class citizens, many of us have heard this song before, but listening to it now, it takes on a whole new meaning. Great song.

Forgotten is a heartfelt song about the plight of young white lads who have been murdered for the crime of being white. This is a very moving song, has a beautiful line "Why don't we here of the suffering and pain, the families and victims who died without blame."

Voices of the Dead, is a heavy-metal song with an incredible tempo and almost demonic feel to it. Alan Smith's vocal on this is creepy, disturbing, as he sings from the perspective of the dead who have come back to ask modern day Britons to stand up and fight. This is really the biggest direction change that GWR have taken. For those of you who love hard, fast heavy metal music, you will love this.

West Wind is sung by Lee Haggan. This is the album title track, and for good reason. This is a big anthemic song which is stirring and triumphant. If you want to be inspired, you will love West Wind. Chorus line goes "But the west wind that rolls from the mountains, the west wind that rolls 'cross the bay, the west wind that springs from the depths of our soul, will sweep all the others away". This is a great ending to the album, and it is a markedly different direction of music by Lee Haggan to embark on. Another rocky number of anthemic proportions.

On the whole, West Wind is a great listen and I would highly recommend you give it a go. It marks a new era for popular nationalist music in the UK. Great White Records are indeed now producing some of the finest nationalistic music in the UK.

Yes, I want to order a copy of West Wind and I enclose a cheque or postal order made payable to 'Great White Records' for £11 (inc. P&p).

The Blood of the Isles

PART 3

» Alastair Harper concludes his comments on the writings of Professor Bryan Sykes which give us a genetic history of the British Isles and show that the essence of our British nationalism lies in our blood.

Mutations occur when there is an error in the copying of the DNA message. This copying is perpetual and countless in its extent. When a mutation occurs, and no one yet has a final explanation for the phenomenon, the cells which produce the proteins on which all life depends change the form of creation in that particular sequence and provide the genetic variation which powers evolution.

Sykes outlines the indifference of most mutations and the few that are bad and therefore self-destructive and the few which enhance the lives of their hosts and therefore are deemed good for this reason.

Two features of mitochondrial DNA are supremely important. In the first place mitochondrial DNA mutates twenty times faster than do other nuclear cells. Mitochondrial DNA, for whatever reason, suffers very many more errors, that is, mutations, than do the nuclear genes. After our presumed 150,000 years as a species 95% of people in a stretch of 1,000 nuclear genes will have exactly the same sequence. Taking a similar stretch of mitochondrial DNA the difference between the sequences is almost total. It is this process which makes us genetically like the anthropoids and the lesser animals but it is the mitochondrial DNA which makes the critical difference between individuals and individual human groups. Vive la différence!

The second feature of importance about mitochondrial DNA is that, unlike the nuclear cells inherited equally from both parents, mitochondrial DNA is inherited exclusively from the mother. Mitochondrial DNA tells only the history of women.

The man's story is told by reason of the possession of the Y chromosome. In like manner to the transmission of the mitochondrial DNA from mother to daughter the Y chromosome passes exclusively from father to son.

Of considerable interest to those anxious to learn about the bearing of DNA on human groupings is a stretch of DNA called the "control region". This stretch of 400 bases for whatever reason are unaffected by mutations. They are immune to the changes which destroy other genetic particles. In the research work in Europe Prof. Sykes and his team came to realise that there were distinct "control region" mutation patterns and by this recognition they identified seven groups by their signature mutations. Thus it was that the conclusion of seven original mitochondrial fountainheads within the native Europeans was arrived at.

The concluding chapters of Blood of the Isles deals understandably with the DNA distribution of the four constituent nations Irish, Scottish, Welsh and English.

ORIGINS OF THE IRISH

Professor Sykes begins his genetic archaeology of the Irish by showing that the oldest mitochondrial references are of the clan Ursula whose origin in northern Greece can be dated to c. 45,000 years ago. The first settlers in Ireland were Ursulans who settled on the banks of the Bann about 9000 years ago. By involving calculations which to the layman at first seem difficult Professor Sykes demonstrates that 10% of Irish men and women are the direct descendants of Ursula, 570,000 in all of Ireland. Because the clan is so old a greater number of mutations have occurred in the trek across Europe. Out of the 91 Irish Ursulans 68 had the Oisín Y chromosome matching samples elsewhere in Europe and only 23 were unique to Ireland thus revealing the length of time their European journey had taken them.

By the same analytical process it was revealed that the other clans arrived in Ireland between 7,000 to 4,000 years ago with the clan of Jasmine, that of the Neolithic farmers, the most recent arrivals.

The long held notion that the Celts arrived in Ireland c. 200 B.C. sits very uneasily with these conclusions. This leaves Professor Sykes with the task of explaining the existence of the Celtic language in Ireland and Scotland and indeed the presence of the language throughout the whole of the British Isles by the time of the Roman Conquest. He explains the presence of Celtic symbols and artefacts to trade and cultural drift from the Hallstatt and La Tene culture in central Europe.

By far the greatest number of Irish Y chromosomes belong to the clan Professor Sykes has named Oisín. Oisín, little deer, was the son of the hero Finn mac Cool, leader of the Fianna, a band of elite warriors. Oisín, his son, is bewitched by Níav of the Golden hair, daughter of the Underworld King who rules over Tír na n'Og, Land of the Ever Young. These characters are central to the mythology of Ireland and bespeak the primordial view of the Irish about themselves.

The proportions of Y chromosome distribution in Ireland give some indication of the direction from which the male progenitors of the Irish have come, for this particular Y chromosome is found extensively down the western European seaboard being well represented in the French and Spanish Basque territories. Comparatively in Europe, Ireland tops the Oisín clan fingerprint with the four provinces, Connacht, Munster, Ulster and Leinster notching up 98%, 95%, 81% and 73% respectively. The lowest score in Leinster reflects the 12th C. arrival of Anglo-Normans under Henry II and the existence of an English bridgehead till 1923.

THE DNA OF SCOTLAND

The chapter devoted to the DNA of Scotland is as absorbing as that of those subsequent on Wales and England.

Contrary to what is generally believed the male population of the Northern Isles is not exclusively derived from the Viking invasions or later Norse settlement. The clan of Oisín is well represented to the tune of just under 65% Pict and 35% Viking. Though this might cause a sharp intake of breath at an Up Helly Aa celebration, Professor Sykes' team revealed that almost one third of Norwegian men today are of the clan Oisín.

The long held presumption that the Northern Isles were overborne by Vikings was shown to be incorrect: what was revealed however was that there was as much Norse mitochondrial DNA in the Northern Isles as there was Norse Y chromosomes and as Professor Sykes' team concluded the Vikings must have brought their women with them. He does however admit that in view of the fact that after the cessation of Norse rule in the Northern Isles in the 15th century there would have been an immigration from the Scottish mainland which would very likely have altered the genetic balance.

Turning to the vexed question of the Picts, the examination of the mitochondrial DNA in the regions of Grampian, Tayside and Fife indicated that there was no significant difference between the genetic footprints of the Pictish relic populations in their heartland from that in the rest of Scotland or indeed in any other part of the Isles. As one who had long laboured under the delusion that the Picts were a race apart in Scotland, the findings on their genetic archaeology came as a mild shock, but as Robert Burns reminded us "Facts are chieftains that winna ding". (There is no escaping the truth of things)

The introduction to the work of Professor Sykes, particularly my reading of Blood of the Isles, led me to put my money where my mouth was. I had my DNA tested for both mitochondrial and Y chromosome. Since my maternal ancestry led me back through a reputedly "pious woman" from Longtown just over the English border, my great grandmother, she having the distinction of being descended from the family of Guy Fawkes, I reckoned that I would be designated the category of the tribe of Helena by far the most commonly met with genetic female footprint in the British Isles, and I was not mistaken.

Since the Harpers lie thick on the ground in graveyards on Deeside and Speyside in Grampian I always presumed that my furthest male ancestor would be a Pict of the Picts.

However, no such evidence emerged from the analyser of Oxford Ancestors for they concluded "with a high level of confidence" that my deepest paternal ancestor was a Norse Viking and that I shared an exact Y chromosome match with four other men; two resident in the U.S. whose origins had been in Scotland and Poland, one resident in Norway whose origin had been in the Faroes, and one now living in England whose birthplace had also been in Poland. All a bit uncanny, but it does reveal the ancient truth that lies within each and everyone of us and the unbroken line that connects us with our individual past.

My particular genetic analysis on the male side can be used as an illustration of the distribution of the paternal clans in Scotland. The clan of Oisín, the predominant male print in the Isles, accounts for 73% of Scottish males. In Argyll, Grampian and the Borders the figures stand at 81%, 83% and 78% respectively. In contrast with these high values the Viking clan of Sigurd reveals itself in these regions as 7.5%, 2.4%, and 3.1%. The all - Scotland Sigurd total is 8.8% with the closely allied Wodan tribe rising to 15.4%. When one reads that in the Northern Isles 76.8% of males owe genetic allegiance to Sigurd and Wodan one realises how localised the Scandinavian penetrations of Scotland actually were.

No examination of the genetic archaeology of Scotland would be worth its salt if mention had not been made of the colonisation of western Scotland by the Dalriadan Celts who had suffered defeat at the hands of the rival kingdom of the O'Neill. This event resulted in the replacement of the P Gaelic language of the Picts with the Q Gaelic of the Irish and the ultimate overlordship of the Gaelic Kenneth MacAlpine in 843, this latter leading to the eventual unification of the Scottish kingdom. The Irish, by contrast, remained a people of separate, petty, warring kingdoms, a fact which has defined their history to the present day.

Professor Sykes in his earlier work Adam's Curse related the fascinating account of the Somerled gene and the chiefly apportioning of attractive females to himself and his immediate family. Until 1746 this strictly patriarchal practice continued in Highland Gaelic society leaving recognisable physical imprints to this very day on many of those of Highland Scottish extraction.

We are left in no doubt that the genetic evidence points clearly to an underlying connection between the Gaels of Dalriada in the west and the Picts of Fife, Tayside and Grampian.

Scotland is revealed as a whole as being possessed of a basic Iberian Celtic/Pictish stock with a substantial arc of Viking inheritance stretching from the Northern Isles via the north coast through the Western Isles and tapering off in Argyll.

WALES

Exploration of the DNA pattern of the Welsh people does not reveal any significant differences from those of the Scots and the Irish. The Scots parade a 45% presence of the Helena gene, the Welsh a 46% presence. The ancient female line of Ursula is represented in Wales at 10.8, in Scotland 8.4. The more recently arrived Neolithic clan of agriculturalists does show a slightly greater disparity with a Welsh reading of 8.8 and a Scottish equivalent of 13.4. There is a marked continuity between Wales and Ireland and Grampian in Scotland in the other mitochondrial lines.

Of Viking Y chromosomes Professor Sykes' scrutiny found only the barest trace in Welsh males. The omnipresent Oisín Y chromosome is at its highest point of 86% outside Ireland and the Atlantis variant of this gene bespeaks a relationship with the Basques of northern Spain and Pyrenean France.

The examination of the genetic archaeology of the Welsh reveals what we are continually reminded of by the Sykesian research in that the British peoples are an ancient blend of similar blood.

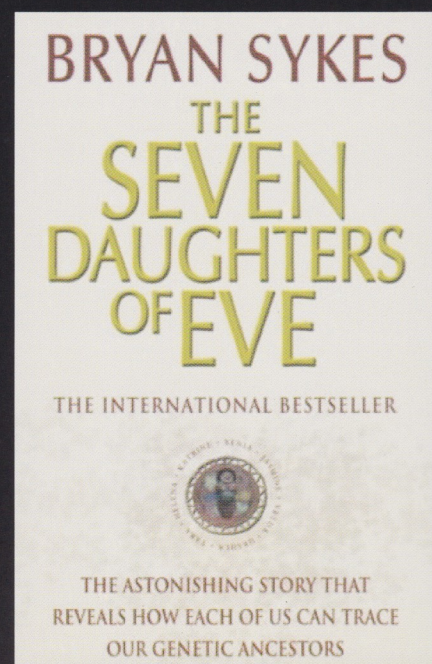

THE ENGLISH

Professor Sykes concludes Blood of the Isles with a historical review of the inhabitants of what is now called England from those who first colonised the Isles from Europe travelling over the land bridge some 12000 years ago. From the Mesolithic hunters he passes to the Neolithic agriculturalists and the slow changes wrought by the new modes of cropping and animal husbandry. He traces the progression from bronze to iron usage and brings us to the Roman Occupation. All the salient characters are present from Queen Boudicca, Caractacus, Hadrian, Antonine and Tacitus. He ponders the effect of the genetic losses as a result of Boudicca's defeat and that of Mons Graupius in Scotland. The respective slaughters, he calculates, would reduce the diversity of the surviving population by reason of a smaller number of fathers siring multiple children. He ascribes little significance genetically to the Roman Occupation the great majority of whose soldiers belonged to kindred European clans, and such exotic mitochondrial traces as he has located in the south of England he apportions to the existence through the generations of female Roman slaves. The 600 or so years from the departure of the Romans to the Norman Conquest were critical in the formation of the English people seeing as they did the Anglo Saxon, Danish and Norman Invasions.

By reason of its disturbed history England presents the most mixed of any of the regions of the Isles. The clan of Helena, ever present in the Isles, is high, 43% in East Anglia and 47% in the north of England. The descendants of the Neolithic agriculturalists, the Jasmine clan, are represented in England by two branches, one which has come to England by the overland European route, the other bifurcation coming by the ocean route from the Balkans via Iberia, and the French coast. There is in the mitochondrial situation in England a marked increase of lesser clans Wanda, Zenia and Ulrike, now recognised by Professor Sykes as the "eighth" daughter of Eve. This latter clan is very common in Scandinavia and clearly has Viking roots. Like the Viking female descent in the Northern Isles the evidence of Ulrike's and Wanda's descendants in England indicates female immigration from the east and it is noteworthy that similar intrusions do not occur in the north and west of the Isles.

The male picture is widely different from that evidenced in the other regions of the Isles. The clan of Oisín, preponderant in Ireland, Scotland and Wales, falls to a low of 51% in East Anglia. The clan of Wodan is at its highest proportion in East Anglia.

Viking Sigurds there are aplenty in the north of England and in southern and central England Wodans and Sigurds abound.

A few quotations from the concluding chapter of Blood of the Isles is in order so that the readers and the critics of this article may be in no doubt about the depth and precision of the work of Professor Bryan Sykes and his indefatigable teams. A reviewer is bound to impart a measure of the subjective into his work, as Professor Sykes for example, commented upon the groundbreaking work of Dr. John Beddoe. The following quotes are in my view memorable and in their zest and clarity well worthy of repetition in the discussions which must follow the reading of this exceptional book:

"The matrilineal history of the Isles is both ancient and continuous. I see no reason at all from the results why many of our maternal lineages should not go right back through the millennia to the very first Palaeolithic and Mesolithic settlers who reached our islands around 10,000 years ago."

"One myth that the genetic evidence certainly does not support is the relic nature of the Picts. Their ancestors, just like the rest of the people of the Isles, have been there a very long time, but they are from the same basic stock. They are from the same mixture of Iberian and European Mesolithic ancestry that forms the Pictish/Celtic substructure of the Isles. It is very clear from the genetic evidence that there is no fundamental genetic difference between Pict and Celt."

"This ancient matrilineal bedrock has been overlain to any substantial extent in only two places. In Orkney and Shetland there was a large settlement of women from Norway during the Viking period and the ancestors of roughly 40 per cent of today's Shetlanders and 30 per cent of modern Orcadians first stepped ashore from a Viking ship. The second overlay is in eastern and northern England, above the Danelaw line which ran from London to Chester. Above that line and particularly in the east, there are clear signals of female settlement overlying the Celtic substratum. As we have already touched on, it is very difficult to distinguish Saxon, Dane and Norman on a genetic basis, since they are all from the same Germanic/Scandinavian origins."

But what about the men? "The clan of Oisín still predominates in every part of England, but the bedrock is substantially overlaid in the east. I estimate that approximately 10% of men living in the south of England are the patrilineal descendants of Saxons or Danes, while above the Danelaw line the proportion increases to 15 per cent overall, reaching 20 per cent in East Anglia."

"Overall the genetic structure of the Isles is stubbornly Celtic, if by that we mean descent from people who were here before the Romans and who spoke a Celtic language. Whatever we may feel about ourselves and about each other, we are genetically rooted in a Celtic past. The Irish, the Welsh and the Scots know this, but the English sometimes think otherwise. But, just a little way beneath the surface the strands of ancestry weave us all together as the children of a common past."

The three books reviewed are of crucial importance today, particularly Blood of the Isles, being as it is a defining statement of what it is to be British.

In the first place Blood of the Isles lays to rest at one stroke the fallacy that it is open to anyone to be British.

The essence of our British nationalism lies exclusively in our blood. What that blood signifies has been revealed in strictly scientific terms by Professor Bryan Sykes in his analyses and interpretations of thousands of genetic samples taken throughout the British Isles and the Republic of Ireland. With one whiff of grapeshot the anti-natural, egalitarian social engineering which has dominated anthropology for more than half a century is riddled with holes.

What Blood of the Isles shows crystal clear is that the fiction of "civic" nationalism is arrant nonsense in terms of facts and pernicious politics in terms of intent.

As the Duke of Wellington said "Being born in a stable does not make one a horse" Britishness is chromosomal not residential.

By the very nature of scientific enquiry the defining truth of genetic archaeology expressed in Blood of the Isles will not stop with the conclusions arrived at there. The edge of discovery is ever shifting. What Charles Darwin in the Origin of Species began is being pursued by scientists like Professor Sykes and as human genetics now advances untrammelled by the discredited restrictions of liberal, post Marxist political dogma, deeper insights yet will be obtained into our racial origins and the profound differences which are at the root of human individuality.

The Day That Gilbert Upset Disraeli

Picture the setting: The opening night of HMS Pinafore, where the Savoy theatre is packed with the glitterati of the day, including the Prime Minister Mr. Disraeli.

Disraeli, along with the rest of the audience, is enjoying the show, until on stage a barge is seen to be approaching HMS Pinafore. From it steps Sir Joseph Porter; First Lord of the Admiralty. Sir Joseph himself has risen from humble beginnings to gain his office by political acumen, despite having never gone to sea! Sir Joseph introduces himself in an impressive song: Ruler of the Queen's Navee.

*I grew so rich that I was sent
By a Pocket Borough to Parliament
I always voted at my party's call,
And I never thought of thinking for myself at all.
I thought so little, they rewarded me
By making me the Ruler of the Queen's Navee!*

At this point, on the verge of an epileptic fit, Mr. Disraeli storms out of the theatre. The cheers of the audience echo behind him.

The song was a satirical 'take-off' by Gilbert of the newly appointed First Sea Lord, William H. Smith, who suffered a lack of familiarity with the ocean being the only First Sea Lord never to have served in the Royal Navy.

In fact, it was because the characterisation of Admiral Sir Joseph Porter was so close to Disraeli's First Lord of the Admiralty, W. H. Smith, that Gilbert's knighthood was delayed for twenty years.

By now you will be asking yourself what has HMS Pinafore to do with present day politics. Is this article a covert plug for the D'Oyle Carte Opera company?

There is a parallel, and it is the fact that our New Labour government has involved Britain in wars in Iraqi and Afghanistan. They are sending our young soldiers out to war badly equipped and unprepared, many of them will not be coming back. Yet, for the first time in Britain's history not one member of the British » Terry Savage, an aficionado of Gilbert and Sullivan operas, gives us another example of Gilbert's delight in liberally sprinkling his operas with political satire. Importantly, he also shows its parallel with the political shenanigans of today in relation to the Middle East.

Government has served in Her Majesty's armed forces. Two Jags being the only minister to have gone to sea and that was only as a steward on a cross channel ferry.

Why have Blair and his fellow Warlords, many like himself a former pacifist, invaded these two countries? Blair told us it was because of weapons of mass destruction: this turned out to be a blatant lie. The reason for invading Afghanistan, we were told, was to overthrow the Taliban government. Their government may have gone, but the Taliban certainly have not. So what's in it for Britain or for that matter themselves? For the British it means higher taxes, the loss of loved ones, a worsening of race relations. For them, it remains to be seen. However, oil would appear to be the prize.

Iraq has the world's second largest proven oil reserves. According to oil industry experts, new exploration will probably raise Iraq's reserves to 200+ billion barrels of cheap-to-produce high-grade crude, have long wished to get back into Iraq, from which they were excluded by the nationalisation of 1972. But UN sanctions (kept in place by the US and the UK) kept those contracts inoperable. Since the invasion and occupation of Iraq in 2003, this has changed.

The four main oil companies located in the US and the UK

With Washington now in control, 'friendly' companies expect to gain most of the lucrative oil deals that will be worth hundreds of billions of dollars in profits in the coming decades. The new Iraqi constitution of 2005, greatly influenced by US advisors, contains language that guarantees a major role for foreign companies.

Negotiators hope to complete deals on Production Sharing Agreements that will give the companies control over dozens of fields, including the fabled super-giant Majnoon.

OIL THROUGH IRAN?

Why invade Afghanistan? It would appear that to the north of Afghanistan is one of the wealthiest oil fields in the world on the Eastern Shore of the Caspian Sea in the new republics of the former Soviet Union. American oil companies are involved in an oil boom larger than any in the last 40 years in this region. Untold wealth is at stake depending on getting the oil out of the landlocked region through a warm water port.

The simplest and cheapest route is through Iran. It is the route favoured by all oil companies, because it involves building a short pipeline and transhipping the oil through the existing Iranian petroleum network.

The US Government has such massive antipathy to Iran that it is willing to do anything to prevent this from happening. One alternate route would be through Afghanistan and Pakistan. The difficulty is in securing the agreement of the powers that be in Afghanistan. Annexation would appear to be the American answer to this problem. Alternatively, if Bush and Blair thought they could get away with it, a regime change in Iran would also be an answer to the problem. Hence the current sabre rattling against Iran.

Once again Liberal Democracy showing its true colours: Pacifists turned War Lords, to ensure that Global Capitalist get rich on the blood of young British and American troops, not to mention hundreds of thousands of Iraqi and Afghan men, women and children.

Returning to Gilbert and Sullivan, Gilbert's talent for political satire would have run riot portraying the perfidious actions of Bush and Blair and their henchmen.

No doubt if Blair had been present on the first night of The Pirates of Penzance, he too would have stormed out of the theatre, on hearing the words to the Modern Major General, assuming that it was a reference to him as an Armchair War Lord.

*When I have learnt what progress has been made in modern gunnery
When I know no more of tactics than a novice in a nunnery
In short, when I've a smattering of elemental strategy You'll say a better Major-General had never sat a gee*

Gilbert & Sullivan would, in all probability, have ended up in the Tower.

The Effectiveness of Voting BNP

The fallout from junior minister Margaret Hodge's theft of part of BNP policy in suggesting that native families should be given housing priority over immigrants, has been most revealing. One could be forgiven for believing that this former immigrant born in Egypt as Margaret Oppenheimer, has moved a long way since she was the 'chair' of Islington Borough Council in 1982 and reflected her Marxist views by flying the red flag over the town hall. But her critics, including those on the left, saw that there was little real political change and that her original comments to The Observer were those of a hypocrite, and not just because she happens to own three houses.

As most Identity readers will know, her Parliamentary seat is Barking, in East London, which has a strong BNP vote - 12 BNP councillors are the official opposition on Dagenham and Barking Council. This was the reason for her appearing to put native born families first; her concern that she could lose her seat to the BNP.

The most important message to come out of it, of course, is that if your area gives substantial votes to the BNP your council will stop giving houses to immigrants. I hope our party activists will take this on board as an answer to those who say: "We agree with the BNP but it will have no effect if we vote for you." And you can add that Labour Party chairman Hazel Blears also responded to the BNP electoral threat in towns and inner cities by supporting Margaret Hodge and agreeing that there was a need "to tackle these tough issues."

Most Labour party colleagues who made comment on Margaret Hodge's efforts to hold her seat were very critical. Ken Livingstone (who can only remain London mayor by the immigrant vote) said her outburst would be "catastrophic for community relations", while Labour MP Diane Abbott tabled a Commons motion condemning her remarks. She made the revealing comment: "This is supposed to be a Labour government, so why are some ministers allowing the BNP to dictate our policies?"

Keith Vaz, who is of Indian origin and Labour's former European minister, supported Ms Abbott. He expressed "regret at the honourable member for Barking's recent call to give British people housing priority over immigrants." The two were also supported by Jon Cruddas, the labour deputy leadership hopeful, MP for Dagenham and a leading BNP critic and witch-hunter of 'racists'.

And what of the Tory Cameroons? Dave the leader responded by cautioning MPs against "pouring out of their surgeries" and adding to the debate on immigration after listening to complaints from constituents which could be "based upon rumour and inaccuracies."

The same day that I read that (May 22nd), the newspaper once known as the "Torygraph" carried an article by a regular columnist Andrew O'Hagan headed "Shame on you, Margaret Hodge." He must obviously be a Cameron supporter with the following comment, which sums up the general approach of his article: "What a terrible smallness she exudes in her estimation of how we as a society should deal with our neediest inhabitants. No matter how they come to be on these islands, by birth or by boat, if they are legitimately here, then we should find a way to raise ourselves to a show of decency and hospitality."

For the record, Andrew O'Hagan, is a novelist and a former writer for The Guardian, where one would expect him to be more at home. Perhaps his concern for immigrants is reflected in his being a UNICEF UK Ambassador and a UNICEF Children and AIDS advisor for Eastern Southern Africa. The Daily Telegraph of late does have some rather left-wing writers. I have still not got over the shock two months ago when they commissioned the Marxist, second-rate guitar plucking singer Billy Bragg to write an article on the meaning of patriotism. It was like asking King Herod to do a piece on the welfare of small boys.

Grammar Schools Should Be Part Of An Educational Choice

Having delivered another insult to former Tory voters worried about the effects of immigration, tireless and tieless Dave has now launched a broadside against those erstwhile voters who support grammar schools, including telling them that they are "delusional". Again following much of the Blairite agenda, Cameron has made it clear that a Tory government would not add to the remaining grammar schools. A number of Tory MPs fear that he would even undermine support for the 164 that still exist.

The shadow education secretary, David Willetts, is a former grammar school boy, as is David Davis, but David Cameron is one of many leading Conservatives who either went to Eton or other private education establishments. The BNP would not abolish such private education, but support other systems that will give our youth the opportunity to develop their full potential, irrespective of the disposable income of their parents. This must include grammar schools and therefore they should be available in city areas as well as in the more affluent parts of Kent or Manchester, as at present. This has long been in our election manifesto. We believe that grammar schools are the best way of allowing social mobility and a genuine meritocracy. Regardless of socio-economic status and parental income, grammar schools allow the brightest and keenest children of working class and lower middle class parents, as well as others, to excel in academic studies. This would, of course, mean reintroducing an eleven plus examination, but we recommend a retest at 13 for the "slower developer."

The Conservatives under Cameron, together with the Lib-Dems, now favour Blair's City Academies, which David Willetts argues have shown they can offer chances to "academically able pupils from deprived backgrounds". Now we have the hub of the matter as far as the Cameroons are concerned. "Deprived backgrounds" in this context is doublespeak for "ethnic minorities" but can be dressed up to include "poor whites". It is part of the tactics to compete with Labour and the Lib-Dems over the middle ground where the party that can gain most of the all-important ethnic vote (now at least 10% of the total) gains power. And power, as Blair has shown, is far more important than any political principles.

Blair's large City Academies have so far lacked any success but have scooped up money that should have been spent in improving the mainly smaller existing comprehensives and on a massive expansion of the Grammar Schools network. We should also extend the use of streaming and setting, with smaller classes, in the comprehensives to allow even more pupils to develop their abilities without the dominating presence of their disruptive peers. Added to this, it is urgent that we should return to developing technical schools.

There is little point in moaning because building and other industries are happy to employ Polish carpenters, plumbers, electricians, etc, when a diminishing number of our young people lack any of these skills. Mainly for this reason over half a million British 18-24 year olds are out of work. More technical schools and colleges would alleviate this considerably. This has the support of the British Chambers of Commerce, a leading representative of small businesses, who only last month urged the government that immigration is not the long-term answer to tackle the "tragic skills shortage that many young British people have."

"Immigration Figures Are Not Fit For Purpose"

It is difficult to get away from the subject of immigration unless, of course, you are a political ostrich with an enhanced ability for burying your head in the sand. It was also revealed last month that council leaders around the country have complained that official statistics underestimate the number of immigrants in their areas. According to the Daily Telegraph, 15.05.07, Richard Stokes, leader of Slough Council said: "The figures just do not add up. Official migration statistics are not fit for purpose."

The official figures from the Office for National Statistics suggest the town's population is falling and that Slough has the second largest decreasing population in the country. However, the Council presented increasing birth rate figures, numbers of households paying council tax, and even measurement of the town's sewage flow, to show that in fact Slough has the ninth fastest population increase in the country!

Similar evidence came from the London boroughs of Westminster, Kensington and Chelsea, Hammersmith, and Fulham, whose leaders said that the new method (the word 'fiddle' springs to mind) of calculating immigration does not "remotely" represent the true picture.

The concern shown by the Councils is because they receive around £600 for every person in the borough from central government. The miscalculation could lead to a council tax rise of £27 a head.

Liam Byrne, the Home Office Minister, responded to this by saying that while there were problems, "the advantages of immigration should also be taken into account". These alleged advantages now include the new mythical figure that immigrants were contributing £125 billion (yes, 'billion') a year equivalent to 10% of total GDP.

This lie was later echoed by Tony Blair's Downing Street spokesman.

Sir Andrew Green of Migrationwatch said the claim was "ludicrously misleading". He added: "On a per capita basis the actual benefit to the native population is about 50p a week." And as we have said before, this 50p is provided by European and American high-flyers in the City of London, not by African or Pakistani peasants.

Radical Muslims Should Be Asked To Leave

The recent warning by the former Metropolitan Police

Commissioner that up to 4,000 terrorism suspects and their supporters are active in Britain, explains why three associates of the fertiliser bomb plotters were able to go on the run after breaching anti-terrorism control orders. There is just no room to hold 4,000 suspects in custody, even if the plethora of Human Rights lawyers would allow it.

One answer is to adopt the non-prevaricating attitude of Australia's Prime Minister, John Howard, and some of his other ministers. Muslims who want to live under Islamic Sharia law have been told to get out of Australia, as its government targeted radicals in a bid to head off potential terror attacks. John Howard has apparently angered some Muslims in Australia by saying he supported spy agencies monitoring the nation's mosques.

Treasurer Peter Costello, seen as heir apparent to Howard, hinted that some radical clerics could be asked to leave the country if they did not accept that Australia was a secular state, and its laws were made by parliament. "If those are not your values, if you want a country which has Shari law or a theocratic state, then Australia is not for you", he said on national television. Education Minister Brendan Nelson later told reporters that Muslims who did not want to accept local values should "clear off". Can you imagine any of the Lib-Lab-Con gang using such outspoken Aussie language?

Tebbit Scorns the BBC's IRA Love-in

I must confess to having a certain respect for Lord (Norman) Tebbit - which does not make me a closet Tory. Typically, he accused the BBC of "debased standards" after it invited him to take part in a programme with the man who planted a bomb at the Grand Hotel in Brighton 23 years ago, which left his wife paralysed and killed five of his Conservative party colleagues.

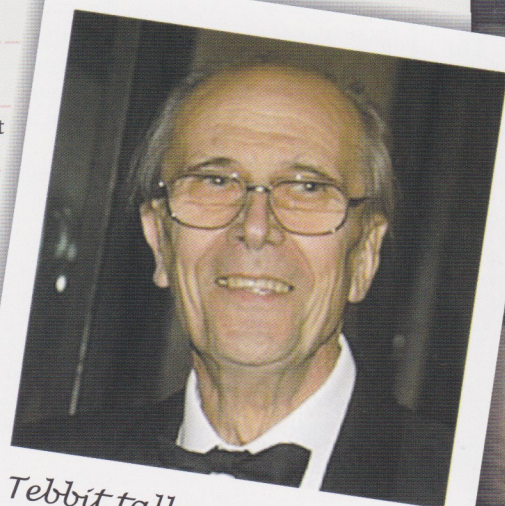

The bomber, Patrick Magee, was given several life sentences but was soon sprung from jail, said Lord Tebbit, "alongside a host of his fellow killers during the remorseless appeasement of IRA/Sinn Fein by Mo Mowlem and Tony Blair."

The Radio 4 programme in which Magee appeared was called The Reunion. Lord Tebbit commented that "it sounds nice enough, rather like Friends Reunited on the internet. Perhaps only the BBC could envisage uniting a killer with the daughter of one of his victims, my friend Tony Berry, and one of those who escaped, Harvey Thomas."

He added: "What a pity Dr Harold Shipman is dead. Putting him back in his surgery for consultation with the families of those he killed and a survivor or two of his medications would have such a contribution to the BBC's mission to inform and entertain."

Bringing us up to date, in an article on the matter in the Daily Telegraph, he wrote: "In the meantime I suppose we must be grateful that the July London bombers killed themselves. At least the BBC will not be able to arrange a reunion programme for them with their victims."

Norman Tebbit at his best!

LETTER OF THE MONTH

Support Grows for the BNP

I recently attended a meeting of the British National Party in Melton.

A crowd of more than 80

listened to a talk about crime and lawlessness, the decline of manufacturing in Britain, which used to be the workshop of the world, the increase in foreign imports, and the overcrowding of these islands by uncontrolled immigration.

It was obvious a lot of local people are concerned with the way this country is being governed. The general consensus was that the three main political parties no longer represent the British majority. A lot of people left the meeting pledging their support for the BNP.

It was certainly an eye-opener that this political party was gaining so much backing that night.

Hard Work Wins Seats

There will be many who try and understand why we did not make huge gains in the recent election and some will make the mistake of putting it down to image problems or our lack of coffee-coloured members. I agree that our image can always be improved upon, but the media and the government will always smear us because they fear us. Not because we are 'racist' but because we have the potential to halt their corrupt gravy train ride and show up the New World Order of global capitalism for the hideous and slave making ideology that it really is.

There are two factors which will equal nationalist success:

1. Hard work by our activists. This is not a problem to those who worked their socks off in the recent campaign, although more can always be done, of course, by more people.
2. A Social Change that hits voters in their pockets. The amount of change required politically is in direct relation to the change people feel they need. As long as the electorate can close their front door, eat a good meal, watch satellite TV, buy nice clothes and so on, they will not feel it necessary for a political revolution.

Within the next decade or two, the debt crisis, fuel crisis, increase in crime and disorder and a myriad of other problems will hit the people of Britain like a bombshell. Then our hard work will pay off. It will come quickly, so the most important thing to do in the next few years is:

1. To expand geographically.
2. Educate our membership so they understand the philosophy of Nationalism.
3. To build our Party infrastructure to cope with almost overnight success, which of course is very dependent on financial support.

How Can We Cope With The Immigrant Flood?

Latest statistics show it will take at least a thousand years to deport the enormous backlog of failed asylum seekers at the Government's present feeble rate. On top of that, almost a million immigrants have landed here from the enlarged EU, but that does not include partners, children or the self-employed, who the Government doesn't even bother to count.

Where will they all live or work after the next wave of even more desperate people is allowed to displace them? After just 12 months in the UK, all their children and other dependants will enjoy full benefit entitlements! With social housing provision, school places, the NHS and state pension funding in permanent crisis, we cannot look after our own people properly, so how can we cater for all of them?

Hard decisions about the 1951 UN Convention, EU Membership, etc are urgently needed, but will Labour, or the Tories and the Lib-Dems, do anything constructive? Of course not, because they are all now beholden to the ethnic minority vote in too many constituencies. Only the BNP can give our people the answers they need in the long run.

Stop Slav Bashing

If the BNP is ever anywhere near achieving political power, then the East European migrant workers will have ceased to be an issue. Long before then the East European economies will have drawn level with or overtaken that of Britain and the migrant flow will have reversed. Many of those currently moaning that "Poles are taking our jobs", would themselves work abroad for a higher wage than they are getting in Britain. A touch of hypocrisy?

As John Bean said, the number of Europeans coming into Britain account for only 12% of the total immigrants. The gutter press does not say too much about the far greater number of non-whites coming here, not to mention the millions of non-whites born here, as that would be seen as racist. Being white, the East Europeans are fair game for vilification by the gutter press.

The New Elites are Destroying our Young

» David Hamilton exposes the "New Elites" who are degrading the young working class, based on some personal observations of Birmingham night life.

The aristocratic elites of the past tried to bring up the quality of life of colonial peoples, but the new elites, who grew out of the new left of the 1960s, prefer to bring us down, while treating aliens as superior. The Discrimination Act of 1975 advises people not to use degrading language of certain selected groups. But our modern elites continually degrade working-class people and our young. They mock them as 'Chavs.'

The streets of entertainment are areas of drunkenness where our young people lose control and are vulnerable to any who would prey on them. Our people rarely see themselves portrayed in a positive light in adverts or on TV, only dark people who look Mediterranean but rarely with English features unless they are advertising our women as whores to the rest of the world. We are not supposed to identify with ourselves. The new elites need have no conscience about bringing immigrants here to take our jobs by undercutting wages and pushing us out of our communities if they think of us as worthless.

The television programme makers are the same sort of people as they have always been and on the look out for something for viewers to laugh at. Only we are now the targets and are having this done to us in front of the rest of the world. Our young are always shown as hopeless.

Everything is used as social engineering. It is not put into words but conveyed by images which are read as body language and semi-conscious messages. Whites are presented as fat, over weight, while ethnics are bright and clean. In How Clean is Your House two women visit inadequate parents with children. They only show lower class white inadequates effing and blinding but never show an inadequate Muslim couple who cannot bring their children up. One of these programmes is shown in 47 countries! This sends the message to potential asylum seekers that we are inadequate and weak and they can come here and live at our expense, and that girls here are easy.

LOSS OF CONTACT

In this situation ordinary people lose contact with their civilisation and become disorientated, lost, suffer from bereavement and become depressed. Our English culture is still amenable to the elites but our manipulated young and those from a de-culturalised background lose the emotional womb of community, and give up. They cannot take refuge in a smaller cultural world like the elites who live in large houses in smart areas of London, or beautiful English villages as country gentlemen. Ordinary people lose heart and, having nowhere to go, descend into vices and viciousness. They are no longer civilised and do not know how to behave. They become prey to amoral manipulators who use and exploit them.

Do the elites do it out of guilt? No, guilt is remorse, you are sorry for what you have done and want to make amends. But our elites do not make amends by bringing immigrants into their own communities, they force them on us and criticise us for objecting. They are proxy masochists who make us suffer for them! The profession of guilt makes them feel virtuous it is an egocentric emotion.

The papers devote many pages to the drugged and drunken antics of celebs and footballers while the celeb magazines and radio stations promote those who have appeared on reality TV programmes. They always show them leaving night clubs drunk and question whether they are wearing knickers or not. The people who make these programmes and write the magazines are educated and intelligent people so they must know what they are doing to our young people. I looked at the covers of two celeb magazines: one stated, "Posh is looking tired and stressed. Is it too much partying?" The other, "Britney and Paris' wild night you drink. I asked who originates these ways of getting drunk quicker "Probably, the breweries", she replied. They have been educated to see themselves as equal to men but in practice women's vital organs are not as strong as men's and they have a greater chance of liver and kidney damage as well as permanent brain damage.

Children are selfish, but become civilised as they grow older and take responsibility for the world around them. This is becoming adult. However, our elites are preventing them from growing up and keeping them immature which is causing so much un-civilised behaviour. Bar owners and the drinks companies play on the weaker part of people's nature rather as a sales scam would play on, say, someone's greed, this plays on the need for fun and escape. It is preying on the young for money by their own people.

I was in a fashionable high street bar recently where young people were drinking alcopop drinks that have pretty colours and fruity flavours like soft drinks but are about 6% alcohol. At the same time the hypnotic music pounds away disorientating them. There are often TV screens all around showing sport, pop groups or models on catwalks. This bar had a couple of bouncy castles upon which customers bounced gleefully, mindless that outside their bubbles of pleasure there is a dangerous, hostile world. A cool bar is an unreal world and like being in a dream. There is also the use of the hallucinatory effects of drugs in adverts. I saw an advert for vodka shots, which was a square of undulating shades of blue light. You do not see these colours by drinking vodka, gulps of air or not. You see this by taking ecstasy.

On a normal evening you see young women collapsed on the pavements usually being attended by paramedics and often stretchered away. I saw one collapse recently and crack her head on the pavement and need treatment. Is that all this young woman is worth? They walk up to cars waiting at traffic lights and ask for lifts and often just open the door and get in. You see them staggering around the streets at 2 to 4 am lobbing their breasts out to stop passing cars for lifts. They are perfect victims for certain types of ethnics and asylum seekers who drive up and down the entertainment streets imitating private hire cars. A number must be raped every weekend and not know it, as many cannot remember how they got home. Later, they might need an abortion or find they are HIV-Positive!

ARBITERS OF TASTE

Pop stars are arbiters of taste and behaviour and must take personal responsibility for the harm they have done to young people by creating degenerate images to make themselves millions. Young people identify with them and are beguiled by their rebellious and exciting images while in reality they live in a different world; in mansions, employ gardeners, maids, cooks and butlers and send their children to the best schools. A template of this is Madonna who in real life is trying to live as an English country lady while in public she pretends to be a rebel effing and blinding and snogging Britney at award ceremonies.

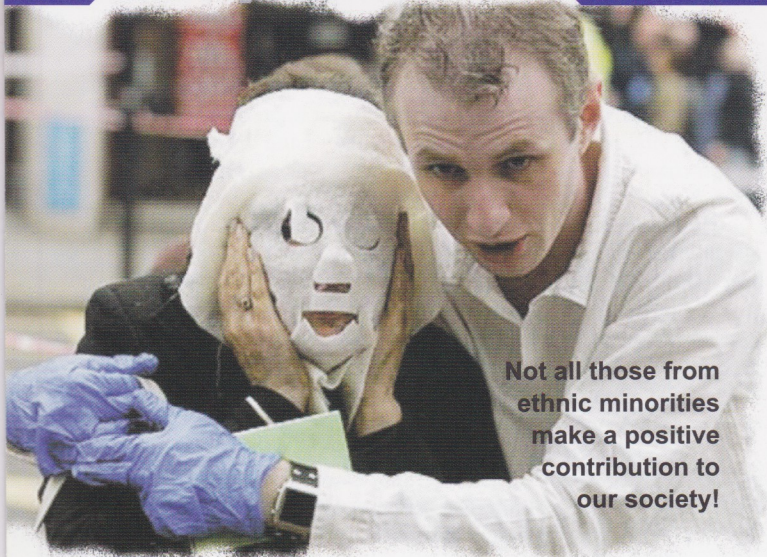

On internet 'Community' sites for young people to meet others our young women present themselves as tarts and most say they "like getting drunk." Their clothes and poses present them as anybody's meat. They are imitating slappers who have made fortunes showing their silicon boobs. Our elites promote these as role models for our young people, but would appear to only promote honourable and worthy people as role models for ethnic minorities. If you walk around an inner city school or community centre the walls are festooned with heroes from the histories of ethnic groups - Gandhi, Marcus Garvey or Harriet Trubman.

Like Rome in decline, we are behaving as though we have out." We are being deprived of self worth in society and seeking it in drink and drugs.

There is a trend in drinking amongst people as young as 10 - 15. We see them all over the country in subways and on recreation grounds, schoolchildren drinking cans that they have often been sold by shopkeepers who would never allow their own children to drink alcohol. If a society is producing alcoholics as young as that there is something seriously wrong. Our young people do not understand their loss of identity, the loss of the sense of who they are and loss of self-worth. What are the consequences? The degradation shows in their social lives when they try to escape from themselves.

A young woman told me how she and her cousin got on one evening. "We were so drunk," she said beaming. Two friends were "so drunk they couldn't stand." I asked if they like getting drunk. "It's social" one replied; the other "It's good fun." They have methods for getting drunk quickly and cheaply like drinking glasses of water while drinking alcohol because it enables you to get drunk quicker." There is also a trick of gulping air down while been conquered. Anyone can have our women and we are supposed to accept it because our elites have passed laws to prevent us objecting. Such laws have features of being conquered we must not fight back, and have to do what the elite and their favoured groups want.

On an entertainment street you will have one bar where the regulars are on pills and another where they use mainly cocaine and most of the doorstaff are on steroids.

Another mode of destruction is clubbing on ecstasy. It is a special occasion like going to church on Sundays. There is an unfinished part of us that is reaching out to become satisfied or whole and this gives a temporary and artificial substitute. A common feature of ecstasy clubbers is a need to escape from themselves which in a healthier age would have led to a mystic journey in solitude as hermits counting their beads and communing with God. In our degraded times they are prey for the hard-headed business people who use any fashion to make money out of their own people.

A young woman explained to me: "It heightens the music, makes it more epic." In common with others it helps them to dance longer, but the important effect is that "it fills you full of love towards those around you, if a girl is being sick in the toilets you pull her hair back for her. I have only seen two fights in eight years of clubbing." She spoke of making friends all over the world through taking ecstasy at clubs. She compared this with aggressive pubs when people are drunk. It is a response to the betrayal of the needs of our young people by our Christian leaders and has fuelled the need for artificial transcendence and artificial communities through drugs. She was seeking community, albeit made artificially more warm and protective by ecstasy.

"Eastern European Workers Shame Lazy Brits" scream the tabloid headlines. This is to justify the elites bringing cheap labour to work for them. It is incredible but the Labour Government and Trades Unions have caused the virtual re-introduction of a form of slavery as some asylum seekers work for almost nothing. On top of asylum seekers and families and spouses coming here, Eastern European immigration makes a total approaching one million per annum.

Unfortunately some immigrants keep letting the elites down by planting bombs, indulging in gang warfare and shooting each other in public.

While we are escaping from life the cleverer immigrants are taking over the professions and administration. What are our young going to do? Where are they going to work when millions are being brought here as cheap labour? The elites have betrayed them.

The Young BNP offers young people healthy activities which will build them up, not degrade them, and develop self-worth and respect. They organise camping and other outdoor activities which build confidence.

We must start Home Schooling networks to give our young the standard of education the state schools are denying them and to instill self-worth and a sense of belonging instead of teaching them to give up their country to outsiders. We can begin reviving local fairs and festivals and developing our Folk music traditions by taking traditional forms but using words and sentiments suitable for our present time to express our sufferings under the elites. These are not rigid formulae but suggestions for our creative young people to develop in practice. They will be able to forge natural, emotional bonds with their own people, their culture and music traditions.

Sadie and the Gypsies

» Having found that the Searchlight Marxist-inspired vilification of BNP Councillors produces little effect, the Lib-Lab-Con hierarchy are trying to present our Councillors as being ineffectual in order to stop further Council seats falling to the BNP. This report by BNP Councillor Nina Brown shows how one new Councillor lost no time in taking action for the local people.

On a Tuesday night, less than a week after Sadie Graham was elected to represent Brinsley on Broxtowe Borough Council, Leicestershire, a band of gypsies arrived on the recreation ground in the village much to the anger and concern of Brinsley residents. Within 20 minutes of their arrival by breaking and entering onto the Parish land, a local resident telephoned

Sadie Graham

Broxtowe Borough Councillor Sadie Graham who immediately attended the site to see what the situation was. Another local resident informed Sadie that they had spoken to one of the male travellers who had said that they would be staying a few days and were expecting several more caravans to arrive to join them during the night. Upon this news a chain was placed around the gate with a padlock to make the gates a bit more secure.

Cllr Graham telephoned the police so that they could ascertain the intentions of the gypsies and hopefully prevent them from staying. Whilst the officer responded to the call fairly quickly, it soon became apparent that the police were not interested in removing the travellers from the site, despite their having broken onto the land unlawfully. Having spoken to a senior officer, the police officer insisted that because they were now on the site there was nothing the police could do. The travellers told him that they would be leaving on Wednesday afternoon and he was satisfied with that. Not only that but he insisted that the chain and padlock be removed from the gate to allow the travellers to leave should they wish to. (Of course, they had arrived at 8pm that evening so it was unlikely that they would decide to leave in the middle of the night). Sadie's argument that we wanted to prevent several more caravans arriving in the night simply fell on deaf ears.

Following a Parish Council meeting on Wednesday, a vote was taken to place another chain and padlock on the gate, but within an hour a resident witnessed one of the travellers cutting through the chain and forcing the gate open to drive his lorry through.

After two days of telephone calls and discussion between councillors, the police, and the BNP legal department a further meeting took place which was attended by several members of the Parish Council along with a local police officer, who came to talk about the options open to us to have the travellers removed. All that the Parish Council wished to do was to use Section 61 of the Criminal Justice Act 1994, which can be used by a Senior Police Officer to remove trespassers from land immediately if criminal damage has been used, (which it had in this instance as the gate had been forcibly broken through). This Act can also be enforced if there are more than six vehicles on the land, including vans, trailers and caravans.

The police, however, were unwilling to enforce this law

despite there being clear evidence that the law had been broken. The reason the police officer gave for not enforcing this legislation was that if the travellers ignored the police request to leave, they would then have to enforce the request by arresting the travellers. This would mean the local police employing extra manpower. For the number of men, women and children on the site, he estimated 16 police officers would be needed.

Then once the travellers were in custody they would have to confiscate the caravans, lorries and vans by impounding them. They would need social workers to provide welfare for the children and God forbid, what if any of the women are pregnant, we would have to provide medical care for them. He insisted they simply do not have that manpower to carry out the job. Well you can imagine what the reaction was by the Parish Councillors! Cllr Sadie Graham pointed out that was it not the job of the police to uphold the law, regardless of how much money it may cost the police!

NOT REALLY BOTHERED

Unbelievably, the police officer then pointed out to Sadie that if she were to insist that the travellers moved on from the site, it would be her responsibility as a Borough Councillor to ensure their welfare and provide the travellers with alternative accommodation for the families and their children. Of course this is not the case. As a borough councillor Sadie has a responsibility to represent the interests of people in the ward that she represents and that does not extend to helping provide land for travellers who pass through the ward! Though the police officer made it clear they would get involved if trouble broke out. What he meant was that the resources would be found immediately if there was any sign of trouble or if local residents decided to take the law into their own hands, because the police were clearly not that bothered about moving them on.

The police officer, Cllr Graham and another parish councillor spoke on Thursday afternoon to the travellers who said that they would be leaving the recreation ground at 5pm on Friday. Finally at 6.45pm on Friday 11th May, the travellers left the site. However they did leave behind a mess of rubbish that it is the thankless task of the council to clear up, paid for by the taxpayers. This is totally unacceptable considering the amount of council tax we law abiding citizens have to pay. So when you have travellers illegally break onto land, despite them not paying council tax or any other tax (other than road tax, sometimes!) they appear to have more rights than your normal, decent, law abiding, tax-paying citizen, who doesn't get their bin emptied if it is left in the wrong position or if the lid is not closed down properly.

This politically correct nonsense just goes to show who this Government are really interested in looking after, making sure that the 'human rights' and welfare of travellers who trespass onto and damage private property are of far more importance than upholding the law, respecting property, the rights of local tax payers and those people who have to go in to clean up the mess they leave behind them.

We would like to add that the local police officers who attended were not to blame for this situation, they were acting on advice from senior officers and we understand the constraints that a New Labour administration has put them under. However we cannot even say that is just another legacy of Blair's Britain, because the weak law of S61 of the CJA was constructed under a Tory government. Although the fact that the police would quite willingly enforce this law if they had the resources and manpower to do so, are all too busy tied up doing bureaucratic paperwork for Mr Blair so that his police forces match their targets!

Of course we are not ruling out the possibility that these travellers were tipped off or sent as a gift from New Labour to the ward of Brinsley in punishment for them electing the first British National Party councillor in Nottinghamshire. Either way Sadie's prompt action is seen locally as being the thing that got rid of the uninvited guests, so it's ended up as another plus for the BNP.
